

Responding to and managing the supply chain challenges

COVID-19 took the world by surprise, impacting business and communities. Supply chains are global and yet vulnerable to risks. Many executives have important supply chain questions to tackle in the coming months in order to ensure the survival and the recovery of their business.

- Do I have appropriate supply chain risk management and business continuity strategies? What should be the next best action to avoid disruptions in the supply chain?
- Is my organization agile within its production and distribution networks to quickly reconfigure and maintain supply demand? Does my organization have the tools to better plan, sense and respond, and even predict, supply chains?
- Do I have systems to understand current inventory levels, to project stock-outs of direct materials and optimize production, or to project stock-outs of finished goods to optimize customer allocation?
- How can I diversify my supply chains from a geographic perspective to reduce the supply-side risks from any one country or region? Is my business overly reliant on a single supplier for key products or I have alternative sources?
- Have I considered key tax & legal compliance aspects, e.g., revisit transfer pricing policies; potential relocation of functions, assets or risks; related VAT and customs implications; contract due diligence?
