The big picture

One mouse click away

Intuitive search, filtering, sorting by relevance or date

“Before I started using Taxparency, I struggled to find the most up-to-date version of guidance – and I was never sure that I really had found the most recent version!”

Client, Swiss bank

Business challenges

Too much, too complex and not connected

Multiple regimes and jurisdictions

The exchange of account and financial information across borders with the objective of tax transparency is the new reality. The Common Reporting Standard (CRS) builds on the Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act (FATCA) and exponentially increases the complexity given the multilateral nature of this regime. FATCA and the Qualified Intermediary (QI) regimes continue in parallel requiring alignment. In combination with multiple jurisdictions it is difficult to keep an overview of all relevant documents and perform cross-jurisdiction or cross-regime analysis.

Locate and access

There is no central location or “golden source” for the key documents with publications from local tax authorities, regulators, other governmental bodies as well as industry groups and a global financial institution needs to constantly monitor numerous sources.

Regulatory change management

A global financial institution must manage regulatory change, properly manage risks, run the business, and operate in a profitable way.

7

Operational consequences

Complex business rules emerge based on the development of local rules and the global network.

6

Dynamic global network

Bi- and multilateral agreements create more than 1,000 relations that require close monitoring as these frequently develop.

5

Documents labyrinth

Regulatory documents are lengthy, multiple versions exist and they are cross-referenced throughout different documents.

4

Tax subject matter

Ensuring the correct tax technical interpretations requires access to a central repository of relevant and current information, skilled internal resources, and qualified advisors.
