Data Protection Compliance Calls for a Full-Scope Solution

The General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), which is coming into force in May 2018 is bringing along some crucial changes, which concern not only legal, but also organizational and IT aspects of the companies. Therefore, in order for the company to bring itself in compliance with GDPR requirements it is not enough to undertake separate actions like, for example, updating the privacy policy on the company's website or amending the client and employment contracts with new data protection clauses. The modern companies require a full-scope solution – a GDPR readiness assessment, which would include a legal analysis of the company's data processing activities, as well as the business processes inventory and data protection assessment of the IT systems.

The aim of such readiness assessment is to find out if and to what extent is the company ready to comply with and implement the GDPR requirements and standards to its business processes.

In order to be able to assess your company's GDPR readiness and get a full picture of it, we suggest that you choose the Deloitte GDPR Gap Assessment service package, which is a full-scope solution to ensure your GDPR readiness.

Deloitte GDPR gap assessment is:

- A powerful tool to create a baseline for privacy
- Based on our Privacy, Security and Governance framework, covering all elements of the described privacy program
- Instrumental in finding the areas with the biggest risk
- Used to focus on those areas which most urgently need action
- A good starting point for a tailored privacy program
- A method to see how mature the organization currently is, using the Deloitte privacy and data protection maturity model

Deloitte has put together the GDPR maturity model. Our practice has shown that while most organizations estimate their privacy maturity to be at level 4, our experience shows that on average, organizations are somewhere between level 2 and 3.
