

Fraud Analytics

The three-minute guide

What is fraud analytics?

Fraud analytics combines analytic technology and techniques with human interaction to help detect potential improper transactions, such as those based on fraud and/or bribery, either before the transactions are completed or after they occur.

The process of fraud analytics involves gathering and storing relevant data and mining it for patterns, discrepancies, and anomalies. The findings are then translated into insights that can allow a company to manage potential threats before they occur as well as develop a proactive fraud and bribery detection environment.

Why it matters now

The world has changed. Are your fraud controls still relevant?

These days, nearly everyone engaged in fraud leaves behind a trail of digital fingerprints. This presents a big opportunity for companies to prevent further harm—but it's often only considered after the damage has been done.

Leaders in fraud prevention are taking advantage of new tools and technologies to harness their data to sniff out instances of fraud, potentially before they fully unfold.

This development couldn't occur at a better time, as events and regulators alike are challenging the controls organizations have used for years. In areas of anti-fraud, anti-bribery, and anti-money laundering, the regulatory environment has tightened. At the same time, fraud, corruption, and abuse are unrelenting—and constantly evolving. It's a different world out there. And fraud analytics can help make sense of it.

Why fraud analytics

More data, more opportunities

Anomaly detection and rules-based methods have been in widespread use to combat fraud, corruption, and abuse for more than 20 years. They're powerful tools, but they still have their limits. Adding analytics to this mix can significantly expand fraud detection capabilities, enhancing the "white box" approach of the rules-based method.¹

Not only can analytics tools enhance rules-based testing methods, but they can also help measure performance to standardize and help fine tune controls for constant improvement. That's a big deal for companies awash in data—data that could be put to better use.

¹ A "white box" approach refers to one that is explainable, repeatable, and defensible.

The potential benefits

Identify hidden patterns

Unsupervised or non-rules-based analyses driven by analytics technology can uncover new patterns, trends, fraudulent schemes, and scenarios that traditional approaches miss.

Enhance and extend existing efforts

Analytics need not replace what you're already doing—it can be an extra layer to add punch to your existing efforts.

Cross the divide

Fraud analytics can pull data from across your organization into one central platform, helping create a true, enterprise-wide approach.

Measure and improve performance

What's working? What's not? With fraud analytics in place, you don't have to guess. The data tells the story.

What to do now

Go where the data is Different parts of your fraud management process generate different types and amounts of data. Start where fraud data is most plentiful and rich.

Examine interdependencies

The most devastating fraudulent activities exploit hidden connections across your organization. By that same token, you need to be able to connect the dots across your data. Analytics can help you look beyond organizational boundaries.

Set off a cultural shift

Fraud management isn't new—your organization likely has a mature set of processes, methods, and talent to take this on. Analytics will help to change the dynamic. If your team isn't ready for it, you may not get the value you need from analytics. Make sure your people are prepared.

Time's up

It doesn't take a massive initiative to get fraud analytics up and running. Many find that it works well to start with a limited project, and then expand from there. It can take as little as a few weeks.

If you're frustrated that a massive amount of fraud-related information is going unused, it's worth giving fraud analytics another look.

To learn more about how to get your fraud analytics initiative off to a smart start, please contact:

Greg Swinehart

Partner

Deloitte Financial Advisory Services LLP
gswinehart@deloitte.com

Frank Hydoski

Director

Deloitte Financial Advisory Services LLP
fhydoski@deloitte.com

This publication contains general information only and Deloitte is not, by means of this publication, rendering accounting, business, financial, investment, legal, tax, or other professional advice or services. This publication is not a substitute for such professional advice or services, nor should it be used as a basis for any decision or action that may affect your business. Before making any decision or taking any action that may affect your business, you should consult a qualified professional advisor. Deloitte shall not be responsible for any loss sustained by any person who relies on this publication.

As used in this document, “Deloitte” means Deloitte Financial Advisory Services LLP, a subsidiary of Deloitte LLP. Please see www.deloitte.com/us/about for a detailed description of the legal structure of Deloitte LLP and its subsidiaries. Certain services may not be available to attest clients under the rules and regulations of public accounting.

Copyright © 2012 Deloitte Development LLC. All rights reserved.