

COVID-19: Updates on regulatory and supervisory responses in Asia Pacific

Asia Pacific Centre for Regulatory Strategy

Dear colleagues and clients,

This email provides an overview of the regulatory and supervisory responses to COVID-19 in Asia Pacific from 8 May – 21 May.

Regulators in our region have responded in a number of ways and we have broken these categories up into five main categories, also used by the International Institute of Finance (IIF):

The next series of newsletters will hone in on some of the key challenges our member firms are seeing within their respective countries, and the insights we can glean as a region from these individual perspectives. This newsletter will focus on the Australian experience and the responses taken by regulators and the industry in managing the impact of COVID-19.

Australia's medical response to COVID-19 has been highlighted as one of the best in the world. The country has effectively flattened the curve, and the federal government is now progressively reopening the economy through its Roadmap to a COVID safe Australia released in early May. Despite this success, the impact has been deeply felt across the economy and significant fiscal and monetary stimulus will continue to be required to keep the Lucky Country on track. It is broadly expected that Australia's 28-year recession-free streak will soon come to an end.

The regulatory reaction in Australia during the early period of the pandemic was swift. The RBA cut interest rates to fresh record lows of 0.25bp, expanded its balance sheet to inject liquidity into the economy and set up a special funding facility for banks to ease margin pressures. The prudential regulator (APRA), only weeks after announcing its supervisory and policy agenda for 2020, chose to suspend it and instead pivot to a focus on operational resilience and a toning down of its rhetoric around 'unquestionably strong' capital. The conduct regulator (ASIC) also suspended its agenda and prioritised customer remediation to focus on its core objective of consumer protection. These measures have ushered the economy through the initial stages of the crisis, but as Australia looks forward cautiously towards the 'new normal', we are reminded that there are still lessons to be learned and emerging risks to be managed.

Others \(Reporting, stress testing, conduct, etc.\)

Operational resilience

The velocity at which the crisis hit exposed weaknesses in the effectiveness of operational resilience and continuity measures. The combination of overstretched technology systems from remote working and massive spikes in the volume of customer requests saw operations stretched to their limits, and significant backlogs quickly developed. Though continuity measures may not typically be designed for such edge cases as COVID-19, the experience will likely change the way in which scenarios are defined and planned for into the future at both the operational and Executive/ Board level. In particular, following a large move towards offshoring of functions in preceding decades, the pandemic has shown how operations in countries with under-developed infrastructure may be unable to manage such pressures and that globally diversified operations may not be as resilient as first thought. In Australia, we have seen a significant number of critical operations and processes move back onshore to ensure business continuity and it is expected that this trend will continue.

Responsible lending

With both implicit and explicit guidance from regulators and government to keep credit flowing throughout the economy, lenders have had to rethink how this will translate into their risk appetite and how effective due diligence should be performed when there is a wholesale shift in the risk profile of the economy. Though ASIC have provided guidance to clarify how lenders may continue to meet their obligations in the current environment, only time will tell whether lenders have taken the right steps. This is further accentuated by the tension regulators are facing in ensuring they continue to take a tough stance on non-compliance in the aftermath of the Royal Commission, and the need for a fair and balanced approach given the current extenuating circumstances. In all cases, we expect to see the supervisory approach continue to place customer outcomes at the forefront.

People risk

It is self-evident that the crisis has taken a toll on the physical and mental health of the population, with extended periods of isolation, distancing and severely overstretched operations leaving many employees (still with a job) at risk of burnout. The longer-term impact these factors will have on the productivity, engagement and overall culture of the 'new normal' workforce is uncertain. We have already seen a high level of movement in senior executives across the industry, and succession planning has again come to the forefront with accountability top-of-mind for regulators and firms. At an operational level, it is likely that the vigilance and consistency of employees in effectively operating key controls and managing material risks could be affected. The true test of effectively integrated risk and compliance practices is how they deliver desired outcomes effectively and efficiently in times of stress, and this could be an area of future regulatory focus.

Despite our relative success in Australia, the impact of COVID-19 has been deep and broad, and no one has been left unaffected. As we move into the next phase of the pandemic, we will begin to reflect on and assess the experience as an opportunity to better prepare for future disruptions, whatever their cause.

The ACRS will be providing updates on a biweekly, best-efforts basis. We would like to express our sincere gratitude to all our regular contributors from around the region who lend their expertise and insight to support the creation of this newsletter.

(The lists below are compiled on a best-efforts basis and are not exhaustive.)

Best regards,

CH CBIRC	14 May	CBIRC Holds Meeting of the Solvency Supervisory Committee
-----------------	---------------	--

Link

The CBIRC recently held a meeting of the Solvency Supervisory Committee. The meeting studied and analysed the solvency condition of the insurance industry in the fourth quarter of 2019 and the first quarter of 2020, reviewed the comprehensive risk rating results of insurance companies and regulatory measures for some companies, analysed the impact of the COVID-19 epidemic on the insurance industry, and set forth work plans on solvency regulation and risk control in the next stage.

It was pointed out at the meeting that due to the COVID-19 epidemic and other factors, the insurance industry experienced heightened business pressure and slowed down its business in the first quarter of this year; yet its overall solvency remained adequate and risks were under control. It was stressed at the meeting that the CBIRC will continue to support insurance institutions to increase capital and strengthen risk compensation capacity. The insurance sector should continue to contribute to the resumption of work and production, defend the bottom-line of preventing systemic risks, and better play the role of "shock absorber" of economy and "stabiliser" of society.
