Workplace Skills Survey

Deloitte conducted an external marketplace survey of 1,000 full-time, U.S. employed corporate professionals to understand what employees are looking for in learning and development opportunities.

Workers view human skills as timeless and essential...

agree human skills are "timeless" and always important.

...but training in human skills is falling short.

think their company values employees with tech skills more than those with human skills.

One out of 3

say they are offered limited or no human skill training programs at their company.

worry future generations will not be equipped with adequate human skills.

Employers are more focused on the here and now, while workers are looking for support for their future...

believe their company focuses more on immediate business needs than providing the training necessary for long-term success.

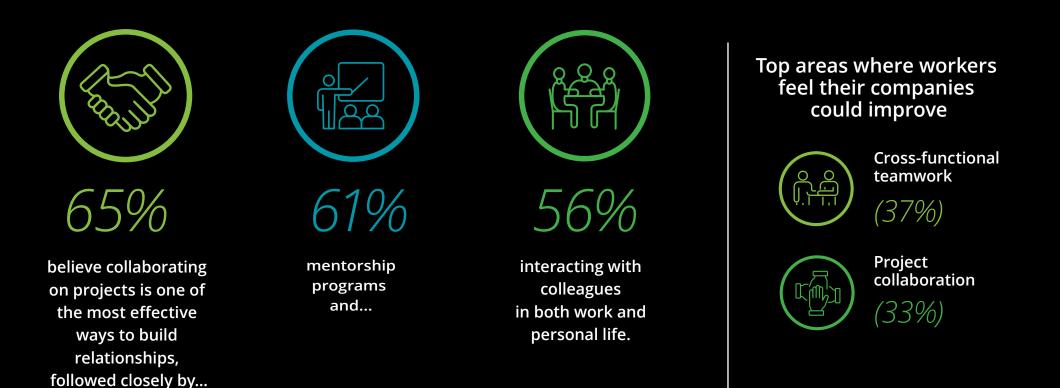

say they worked at a company that pushed employees to learn a new technology-based skillset, only for that technology to fall out of use.

say learning only happens if they initiate it or not at all.

...and crave human connections at work.
