What aspects of Deloitte Consulting were attractive to you during your career transition?

My journey to Deloitte Consulting was not prototypical having started my career for a small, European consulting firm that was very entrepreneurial and then seeing the other side of the consulting equation by working for a large, bureaucratic firm after b-school. So, when I decided to transition from one large consulting firm to another, I knew it would be for three very distinct reasons: the reputation of the firm, the people I would work with, and the culture embodied by the people and the firm. I believe Deloitte Consulting presented an appealing proposition for each of these factors.

How would you describe the culture at Deloitte Consulting?

The culture at Deloitte Consulting is very collegial. Everyone from Business Analysts through to Firm Leadership is extremely approachable, thoughtfully deliberate, and genuinely interesting so that you look forward to spending time with your colleagues outside of working hours. At the same time, people know when to be focused, especially when a project demands it. For people who aspire to leadership roles, it is empowering to know that so many people here take a vested interest in your success and development. Culture dictates that there is enough structure to help you navigate your journey at Deloitte, without having your particular career path pre-determined.

From a client service perspective, how is Deloitte Consulting different from other consultancies?

Deloitte Consulting's value proposition is extensive: we do not operate in just one space, but many, and in each space we serve, we choose to take a leadership position. We help companies develop and frame their corporate strategies, we build these strategies into operational plans, we help clients execute this vision and implement the enabling technologies, and support them post-implementation. We then go further by viewing these services through multiple lenses: the Tax implications of a client's strategy and how that may adjust the execution, what the Risk implications are for a particular outcome, and back this with our Financial Advisory, forensics, and deal structuring capabilities. Very few of our competitors can make these same claims.
