Reducing friction and enabling innovation: How cyber can be a force for change

Host: Deb Golden, principal, US Cyber & Strategic Risk leader, Deloitte Risk & Financial Advisory, Deloitte & Touche LLP

Guest: Debbie Wheeler, vice president and CISO, Delta Air Lines

Deb Golden: The internet of things is poised to rapidly proliferate as we continue to embed connectivity into more and more everyday items. The resulting explosion of data and new attack vectors will put increased pressures on cybersecurity. These pressures will require creative solutions that enable the business to innovate while protecting itself from cyber criminals. As the world becomes more interconnected, security will increasingly need to be considered at each phase of the development process. It can no longer be an afterthought.

Welcome to the resilient podcast, where we feature resilient leaders, real insights and unfiltered stories. My name is Deb Golden, and I'm the US leader of Deloitte Risk & Financial Advisory's Cyber & Strategic Risk services practice. As part of our cyber series, I have the pleasure of speaking with Debbie Wheeler, vice president and CSO at Delta Air Lines.

In this episode, Debbie shares her perspective and experience on how to evangelize cybersecurity across the organization and translate technology goals into business objectives. We also discuss the interconnectivity of today's world and its impact on cybersecurity. I thoroughly enjoyed learning all about Debbie. She is a true proponent of developing the next generation of cyber talent, and I love hearing how excited she gets when she talks about helping these individuals, particularly our young women in cybersecurity to follow in her footsteps. I'm so excited to share this episode with you.
