

A tall order to fill: Enrolling young adults in health insurance

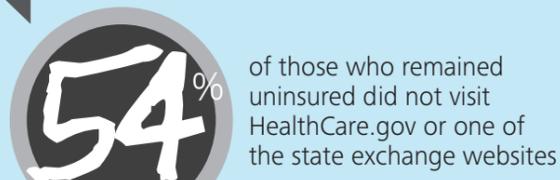

Enrollment of the young adult population (19-34 year olds) is critical to the success of health insurance exchanges. As the first open enrollment period drew to a close, Deloitte surveyed young adults* - both those who did and did not enroll in coverage - for their views about health insurance.

*Respondents were uninsured as of September 30, 2013 and either remained uninsured or subsequently became insured through various avenues.

Out of sight and out of reach:

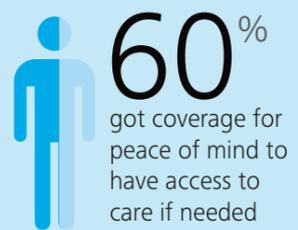

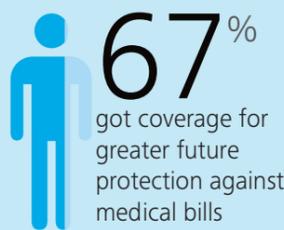

Young adults who remained uninsured said they find health insurance unaffordable (66%) and many do not see its value (46%).

Those who remained uninsured were nearly three times more likely than those who went on to get coverage to abandon and stop enrolling in an exchange due to technical difficulties.

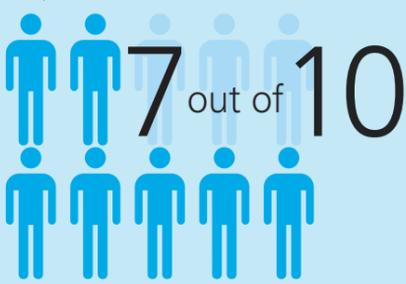

Get it, got it, good:

Young adults who started off uninsured but went on to get coverage do see the value of health insurance.

Don't know what they don't know:

There is still a lack of awareness around elements of the Affordable Care Act intended to make coverage more affordable.

But...

#Social, but not social media:

While there is no dominant source or channel for information to help guide health insurance decisions, traditional sources were more trusted.

MOST TRUSTED INFORMATION SOURCES

MOST INFLUENTIAL COMMUNICATION CHANNELS WHEN CHOOSING A HEALTH PLAN

To enroll and retain young adults, one must first understand them. When it comes to health insurance, the preferences of young adults are clear: They want coverage, they want it to provide value, they need it to be affordable, and they need information to help navigate their options. Can the federal government, states, and the health care industry deliver on that demand to increase enrollment of young adults during special enrollment periods in 2014 and during 2015 open enrollment season?
