Doing more with the same

In this time of continual disruption and rising expectations, internal audit faces talent gaps and a need for transformative change. There are many ways to address these challenges, one of which is providing training for staff and management. In an environment where many chief audit executives expect to manage budgets that may likely remain relatively flat over the next few years¹, training budgets may not be as robust as they once were, leaving you susceptible to operating with lagging and inefficient practices.

Internal audit training, while available through a myriad of qualified service providers and associations, is not always available locally or virtually. Tough decisions must be made on which team members are permitted to participate in training and can lead to internal challenges within the team environment.

How can internal audit departments continue to enhance the technical and soft skills of their people to meet today's expectations while working within the current budget constraints?
